Advanced Communications and PR Management Training Course

Ref: 428_15333 Date: 21 June – 2 July 2027 Location: Singapore Fees: 12000 GBP

Communications and PR Management is a 2-week advanced training course for PR managers, communications directors and corporate affairs specialists who lead the public relations function, and it ends with a PR Strategy and Measurement Plan. Audiences now form opinions across fragmented media, and boards ask what reputation work contributes, so the function must plan, prove and budget like any other. Jupiter Prime Training runs this course in its public relations series.

Why Communications and PR Management Matters Now

Three pressures reshape the public relations function. Media audiences have splintered across news sites, social platforms and owned channels, so a single press release no longer reaches the people who matter. Executives and directors want evidence that communications spending moves trust, enquiries or licence to operate, rather than clipping counts. Agencies, freelancers and in-house specialists must be blended into one budget. A function that plans and measures well earns a seat in strategic decisions; one that does not is cut back at the first squeeze. The course rests on the AMEC Barcelona Principles 3.0, the industry statement on measuring public relations by outcomes and impact.

Who Gains Most from Communications and PR Management

- Heads of public relations who set annual priorities and own the communications budget
- Corporate affairs leads responsible for reputation, issues and executive positioning
- Media relations managers who hold journalist relationships and approve outbound statements
- Communications directors who report reputation results to executives and directors
- Agency relationship owners who brief, select and evaluate external PR partners

A corporate affairs department that sends its head of function, media lead and planning lead together gains most, because they return with one plan, one message set and one measurement approach.

Communications and PR Management Capabilities

Participants move from producing coverage to running a public relations function that plans, budgets and reports like a business unit.

- Design an annual PR plan linked to business goals — for executives approving priorities
- Build a message architecture with proof points — for spokespeople across banking and energy sectors
- Weigh media relations tactics such as exclusives and embargoes — for newsroom and editor relationships
- Apply the Barcelona Principles 3.0 to set outcome measures — for directors judging communications impact
- Calculate a zero-based budget and agency scope — for finance and procurement colleagues
- Communicate PR results in a one-page board report — for the board and chief executive

Key Communications and PR Management Terms

- Message architecture — a structured set of narrative pillars, proof points and audience lines that keeps every statement consistent.
- PESO model — a framework grouping media into paid, earned, shared and owned channels to plan the right mix.
- Barcelona Principles 3.0 — the AMEC principles stating that PR measurement should focus on outcomes and impact rather than output volume.
- Share of voice — the proportion of coverage on a topic that mentions the organisation compared with its peers.
- Holding statement — a short prepared response issued while facts are confirmed during an emerging issue.
- Agency retainer — a recurring fee arrangement that secures an agency's agreed services and hours over a set period.

Applying Communications and PR Management After the Course

- Run a planning session with the communications department to rewrite this year's PR objectives as SMART outcomes tied to business goals.
- Build a first measurement dashboard using Barcelona Principles 3.0 outcome indicators and present it to the executive sponsor.

Communications and PR Management Questions FAQ

What is Communications and PR Management and why does it matter now?

Communications and PR Management is the strategic leadership of an organisation's public relations function. It matters now because audiences are fragmented, boards expect proof of impact, and budgets for agencies and channels must be justified against outcomes.

Which roles gain most from Communications and PR Management training?

Heads of public relations, corporate affairs leads, media relations managers and communications directors gain most. Agency relationship owners also benefit, particularly when several members of one communications department attend and align their plan.

How does Communications and PR Management differ from a foundation public relations course?

It works at function-leadership level rather than practitioner tasks. You plan the annual PR strategy, build message architecture, manage agencies and budgets, and report results to the board, where a foundation course concentrates on writing releases and handling media enquiries.

What do you bring back from Communications and PR Management training?

You bring back a PR Strategy and Measurement Plan for your own organisation. It sets objectives, audiences, message pillars, channel mix, budget lines and outcome indicators that your department can present for approval.

Communications and PR Management: The Way Forward

The PR Strategy and Measurement Plan first informs which campaigns and channels receive budget in the coming cycle. Heads of PR, media managers and agency partners use it to align their activity and reporting. After the first quarter, revisit its outcome indicators and message pillars against the reputation tracking results, because audience attitudes and media habits shift faster than annual plans.
