Advanced Customer Service and Public Relations Training Course

Ref: 215_6626 Date: 7 – 18 December 2026 Location: Dar es Salaam Fees: 9500 GBP

Customer Service and Public Relations is a 2-week training course for public relations officers, customer service leads and corporate communication staff, who leave with a Service Reputation Protection Plan for their organisation. A single unresolved complaint can now become a viral post or a news story within hours, so service decisions and public communication can no longer run separately. Jupiter Prime Training delivers Customer Service and Public Relations for these communicators.

Why Customer Service and Public Relations Matters Now

Three groups now shape service reputation together: customers who publish their experiences instantly, journalists and influencers who amplify the most dramatic cases, and regulators and partners who watch how complaints are resolved. Organisations whose service and communication teams act as one contain issues early and earn credit for transparent fixes; those that work in silos let a routine complaint turn into a public controversy. The course rests on ISO 10002 guidance for complaints handling, Situational Crisis Communication Theory SCCT for response choices and the paid, earned, shared and owned PESO media model.

Who Gains Most from Customer Service and Public Relations

- Public relations officers who manage media enquiries, statements and spokesperson briefings
- Customer service leads who handle complaints with reputational or public exposure
- Corporate communication staff who shape service messages across owned channels
- Social media managers who monitor conversations and reply in public threads
- Stakeholder liaison staff who keep partners, regulators and community groups informed

Organisations that send a PR officer and a customer service lead together gain most, because escalation triggers and message ownership can then be agreed across both functions.

Customer Service and Public Relations Capabilities

Participants practise spotting when a service issue carries reputational weight and responding with one coordinated voice across service and media channels.

- Assess complaints for reputational risk using severity, visibility and spread criteria — escalation panels
- Design an escalation route that hands public-facing cases from service teams to communications — PR leads
- Apply SCCT response strategies to service failures of differing responsibility — spokespersons
- Build holding statements and service messages for predictable incident types — communication teams
- Specify social listening alerts and response rules for public complaint threads — social media managers
- Communicate service changes to stakeholders after an issue is resolved — senior management

Key Customer Service and Public Relations Terms

- Service reputation — the public perception of how reliably and fairly an organisation treats its customers.
- Reputational escalation — moving a complaint to communication specialists once it shows signs of public or media exposure.
- Holding statement — a short, pre-approved message that acknowledges an issue while facts are still being confirmed.
- SCCT — a theory matching crisis responses to how much responsibility stakeholders attribute to the organisation.
- Social listening — monitoring public online conversations about an organisation to detect emerging service issues.
- PESO model — a planning model covering paid, earned, shared and owned media channels.

Applying Customer Service and Public Relations After the Course

- Agree reputational escalation triggers with the complaints team and run one tabletop exercise moving a case from service to communications.
- Draft three holding statements for the most likely service incidents and secure pre-approval from legal and senior management.

Customer Service and Public Relations Questions FAQ

What is customer service and public relations, and why does it matter now?

It is the joint management of how service issues are resolved and how they are communicated publicly. It matters now because complaints spread online within hours, journalists pick up dramatic cases quickly and stakeholders judge organisations by visible fixes.

Which roles gain most from customer service and public relations training?

Public relations officers, customer service leads and corporate communication staff gain most. Social media managers and stakeholder liaison staff also benefit, since they reply in public threads and keep partners and regulators informed during service incidents.

How does customer service and public relations differ from a general crisis management course?

It focuses on service failures and complaints rather than every type of organisational crisis. A crisis management course covers business continuity broadly; here you connect complaint escalation, media handling, social replies and service messaging into one reputation response.

What do you bring back from customer service and public relations training?

You bring back a reputation protection plan for service issues. It sets escalation triggers, role handovers between service and communications, holding statements, social reply rules and the measures leadership will see each month.

Customer Service and Public Relations: The Way Forward

The Service Reputation Protection Plan first informs which complaints move to communications specialists and who speaks for the organisation when they do. PR officers, service leads and communication staff use it to coordinate responses. After its first use, revisit the escalation triggers, since real incidents show which signals arrived too late and which created unnecessary alarm.
